89-7 NPR News Ready To Cover Lame Duck Sessions

Lawmakers tend to be very productive when they don’t have to answer to voters immediately. Usually very little meaningful legislation is passed in the months right before an election. And lawmakers are busy during the period right after an election but before the term ends – the lame duck period.

A lame duck session provides two attractive scenarios for legislators. For those leaving office voluntarily or involuntarily, lame duck sessions provide them with a last chance to win passage of laws they have long supported. For lawmakers staying, but losing majority status, the post-election period gives them a chance to pass legislation before the other party takes control. And finally lame duck sessions, give the party in control the chance to pass legislation long before voters go to the polls again, and many voters’ memories tend to be on the shorter side.

The most contentious issue will be possible changes to Ohio’s abortion law. As of election day, Ohio bans abortions once fetal activity is detected with no exception for rape or incest. A judge has put the law on hold, pending further appeals. During the lame duck session, Ohio’s super majority Republican legislature is expected to consider banning all abortions in Ohio. The debate will be over at what point in the pregnancy the ban would take effect and whether to allow for exceptions.

WOSU and our partners at the Ohio Public Radio Statehouse News Bureau will cover the lame duck session like a blanket. Then it’s up to voters to remember what lawmakers did in these few weeks of December.
